The case of an 82-year-old female patient]. Dislocation or periprosthetic fractures of the hip are a rare complication after total hip arthroplasty. A few cases have been described in the literature, with only a few of them featuring periprosthetic fractures that were long-lasting, with complications leading to further complications like infection or heterotopic ossification. In contrast, we report a case of a late-onset periprosthetic fracture at the proximal anchorage in a patient that had not been taking any kind of antiresorptive medication. We discuss the clinical features, diagnosis and therapy of a periprosthetic fracture at the distal anchorage with particular focus on the differential diagnosis of a traumatic fracture. The fracture was treated by revision, application of a stable implant, debridement of the trochanter and insertion of a long- f678ea99e
